

Resource List:
H1N1 Information and Guidance on the Internet

Federal government resources

www.cdc.gov/h1n1flu: Detailed guidance documents and information for public health professionals, addressing a wide range of issues including communicable disease control measures in health care settings, schools, child care facilities, and correctional institutions; information for vaccine planners; guidance on the use of antivirals; information for specific groups, including pregnant women and others at high risk from H1N1; and legal information, including information about emergency use authorizations for antivirals and N95 respirators.

www.flu.gov: News, vaccine locator, and information for individuals, families, and professionals. A good resource for general information for various audiences, but see the CDC website for detailed guidance documents.

State government resources www.flu.nc.gov: The main portal for information about H1N1 in North Carolina. The main page provides a general overview of H1N1 symptoms and disease control strategies. The sidebar on the right side of the page provides links to more detailed information from the CDC or the NC Division of Public Health.

<http://www.epi.state.nc.us/epi/gcdc/H1N1flu.html>: Detailed information and guidance for public health and health care professionals from the NC Division of Public Health.

Other resources

www.ncphlaw.unc.edu: NC-specific public health law information from the UNC School of Government. To find information about NC communicable disease law, click on “Legal Information by Topic,” then on “Communicable Disease Control.” Includes copies of PowerPoint presentations from the SOG’s September webinar on H1N1, as well as frequently asked questions about NC communicable disease law.

<http://nccphp.sph.unc.edu/panflu/index.htm>: Pandemic flu resources and on-line training materials from the NC Center for Public Health Preparedness. Includes H1N1-specific information, as well as more general information about pandemic flu preparedness.

This list was prepared in October 2009 by Jill Moore, UNC School of Government.
